

Hair Recovery Shampoo $27.95

Hair Recovery Foam $59.95

American Crew Hair Recovery

Balding is the world telling you that you'll never become the silver fox you so achingly want to be (it's every man's dream). American Crew have tried to suppress the level of hair leakage from the scalps of Australian men with their Hair Recovery Shampoo and Hair Recovery Foam. They call it their Trichology range, but it doesn't sound that tricky really – all you do is use the shampoo to prepare the hair for the foam. The foam aims to increase hair shaft density and prolong hair life and extend the hair growth phase, meaning that you have stronger hair that lasts longer for a longer duration of your life. Sounds like a credible way to give Mother Nature the finger until you're at an age when you're happy to have others rub your shiny bald head for good luck. If all else fails, there's always spray on hair.

American Crew Trichology range is available at salons where American Crew is sold. americancrew.com.

InStitchu

For many, buying a suit is a traumatic, painful and incalculably frustrating experience. If anything seems to fit remotely well, it's usually way outside the budget. Gone are the days of suits tailored to your needs or service that ensures that the suit you buy is one that you can afford and can fit you perfectly.

Psych!
InStitchu is trying to encapsulate the tailor suit experience for those without a time machine or plane ticket to South East Asia. By inputting your own measurements and selecting the fabric, colour, lapels, buttons, linings you want, you can create your perfect suit. Alternatively, you can select from one of their pre-selected styles and customise it to your liking. The best part is creating a custom suit begins at $199. I tried to make the craziest, most expensive suit possible (how pretty is it!?) and it unfortunately only came to $356. I think my coffee/negroni budget is more than that.
institchu.com

St Vincent de Paul Winter Appeal

Winter is coming. While ours might not be as bitter as those experienced in Westeros, you can be sure it'll still be bitey. Especially for those with fragile household budgets amidst rising energy costs. The St Vincent de Paul Society provides assistance for those in need, especially during winter months and this winter they're asking you to do something about it too. If you have old bulky coats taking up space in your wardrobe, consider donating them to warm someone less fortunate. And if you're looking for a winter coat yourself to keep you warm, head down to your local Vinnies to grab something vintage that will not only help give your wardrobe a much needed refresh, but also give some much needed funds to helping keep the city warm this winter.

Visit dosomethingaboutit.org.au for more info.

About Face: Supermodels Then And Now

If you think the fact that Kate Moss is 39 and babe'n enough to be the (naked) face of St Tropez tan is truly depressing, About Face: Then And Now is the not-feel-good movie of the year. Timothy Greenfield-Sanders' documentary intimately explores opinions of beauty and aging from the perspective of the original supermodels. The women, Isabella Rossellini, Christie Brinkley, China Machado and Carmen Dell'Orefice among them, are now between fifty to eighty years old and, for the most part, are still smokin'. They discuss the fashion industry (then and now), their careers, aging, plastic surgery and their own changing opinion of beauty and aging, with industry experts, including designer Calvin Klein, also giving input. It'll make you a little bit humble and quite a bit jealous, but the end message reigns that no matter how beautiful you may be, personality is most important. And personality never ages or goes out of fashion.

About Face: Supermodels Then And Now is available now from Madman.

Saba VIP Night

As a part of the Rundle Street East Fashion Series, prime retailer Saba had a VIP Fashion Night. Both men and women in desperate need of some new winter semi-formal to formal attire or business, which is Saba's forte, flocked to the store to see how quality fabrics and sleek tailoring are being utilized this season.

